The issue of "fake news" has been a dominant theme in the headlines fo r several years. How do we define a term that has come to mean so many differen t things to different people?

However, it's important to acknowledge that "fake news" is a compl ex and nuanced problem, one that is far greater than the narrow definition above

. The term itself has become politicized, and is widely used to discredit any op posing viewpoint. Some people use it to cast doubt on their opponents, controver sial issues or the credibility of some media organizations. In addition, technol ogical advances such as the advent of social media enable fake news stories to p roliferate quickly and easily as people share more and more information online.

Increasingly, we rely on online information to understand what is happening in our world.

Misinformation and Disinformation

The universe of "fake news" is much larger than simply false news stor ies. Some stories may have a nugget of truth, but lack any contextualizing detai ls. They may not include any verifiable facts or sources. Some stories may inclu
