Faster internet speeds and improved latency are definitely contributing to a better overall home gaming experience.

A look at some recent web traffic statistics demonstrate not only that more people are taking up gaming as part of their online activities, but that gaming is no longer considered the solitary activity it used to be.

And with eSports, or better defined as professional competitive video gaming, now becoming a popular TV viewing activity among mainstream audiences, the gaming community is bound to grow and expand even more to those who don't traditionally consider themselves gamers.

Forecasts indicate that gaming traffic will increase 8-fold in the U.S.
