In a nation full of football-crazed fans, its no surprise that the NCAAF continues to generate astronomical sums of money in each year on wagers. Whether you care about a specific team or you're just interested in the weekly betting slate, our odds table will help you shop lines across the most popular sportsbooks to get the best edge possible.

Futures bets are those whose result is not determined until much later in the season.

It can be nice to get an expert's take on a particularly challenging matchup for new bettors and veterans alike.

State Betting Guides

While legalized sports betting has been gaining momentum across the United States, it still has a long way to go before being permitted in most states.

NCAAF betting is hard enough as it is.

The state Gaming Commission gave the green light to four mobile betting operators to begin taking wagers Saturday, making New York at least the 18th state to permit online sports gambling in some form.

Here's what you need to know about mobile sports wagering in New York:

The reason why state policymakers were eager to embrace it is simple: Money.

The money from the state tax on mobile betting revenue will, for the most part, be divided up the same way other gambling revenue is.

For the first year, 1% of the state's mobile wagering tax revenue will be reserved for treating problem gambling and educating people about gambling addiction.

New York's state constitution actually has a gambling ban, though you may not know it because of how much, well, gambling happens in the state.

The computer servers for the various mobile betting platforms will be placed at one of the state's private casinos, of which four are up and running.

Those are the four operators that have met all of the state's regulatory requirements at this point, according to the commission.
