If you're looking for the best of a certain type of product rather than feed back on a specific item, you can use the category browsing buttons. Either way,

Trustpilot will return a list of relevant brands:

The short answer is: "Yes". You can trust reviews on Trustpilot. With over 111 million reviews and over a decade of experience, it's a pretty legitimate platform. However, you'll likely find the most valuable reviews when researching brands that are active on the site. It's also important to keep in mind that most customers only take the time to write a review if they had an overwhelmingly positive or negative experience.

For instance, if you look up a well-known big-box retailer, most of the reviews will probably be negative:

On the other hand, many smaller online businesses that maintain active presences on the site have more useful reviews on their profiles. Just keep in mind that the type of product and the seller's investment in its reviews on this platform may influence the accuracy of the results.

Finally, you may want to embed Trustpilot reviews on your website. This acts as social proof to establish the legitimacy of your business. When visitors see that other people have purchased products from you successfully, they'll likely feel more at ease about doing the same. Some plugins connect with review websites to help you display them to your site visitors.
